

National 12 stage history (updated April 2026)

The event began in 1967 following the demise of the London to Brighton relay that had been given National status.

Here, Martin Duff who began his association with the event at the second race in Leicester in 1968 for Manchester & District Lads Club and also ran for Reading, Windsor and finally, Aldershot in 1988, looks at the best performances. Since then, he has reported on the race for Athletics Weekly and still does so today

Before this and up to 1950 the London to Brighton race was restricted to Southern Clubs, however in 1951 the event was opened and adopted as an unofficial "national" championship. This carried on until 1965 when traffic levels on the A23 rendered the event dangerous and the Police no longer allowed it to continue.

No "national" championship was held in 1966 but in 1967 the AAA's started supporting a National Road Relay. The first being held in Whetstone in April 1967. It was held in Leicester for the next two years, 1968 and 1969, but on different courses.

The event firstly moved to Sutton Park in 1970 and, for the first years, used a slightly longer course, starting on the road currently used as the access to some of the car parks. A trip to Derby in 1973 interrupted the tenure but after returning in 1974 has found its spiritual home in the park. There have been alterations since then but the format has remained largely unchanged, until being restricted to just short stages in 2025.

We have separated out times from 2016 onwards as the laps were slightly lengthened.

In the year 2000 a women's six-stage event was introduced over six equal legs on the same short stage that the men used. This was then changed several times before settling on a mix of long and short stages but again went all short in 2025.

It was the non-availability of the use of the dog-leg down to Streetley Gate on the long stages, that meant that the 2025 event was limited to 12 (for the men) and six (for the women) short stages, with the men completely rewriting the records. In that year the women ran six short legs but in 2026 their distance was increased to 5.432km.
